Some are pictures from the moving-image world, including fictional and historical cinema—think Alfred Hitchcock's Blackmail (1929) and Charles Dickens's Oliver Twist (1837), among others. Others are in newsreels and feature films, such as those images of the great elm trees of Gainsborough. Proust's madeleine, made by a low fog and shot with glass, is the first image in the book. "One of the great pleasures of the book," noted a book reviewer. "And who could dispute the pleasure?" The book's use of black-and-white, tinted, and sepia-toned images presents a fascinating contrast between the familiar and the unknown. Night Pictures is a beautiful and touching book about all of us being able to love moving images—and, yes, even love taking pictures.1.
