ZenŌnou-no-naru-o The doors are closed, we don't have to see it. Let's sit down on the cot, put our hands together over our hearts, and wish the eyes of hell were closed forever. We can choose, out in the park, to jump at leaves and twigs and hollows, at bark and thorns, to scream and cry and speak insults and voices or (on the moonless nights) to the thicket, to the distant woods, to the field of termite paths, dead leaves and cockroaches, to the animals and the lizards, to the little lizard, following the scent of rugs and table legs, hills and cottages, to the barking behind the grills of the restless cattles, so that they will waken at once and stretch their necks, yawn, cough gently and begin to howl in fear and terror, that we will be in a hurry and take one another, never to return to this world again. But there are some who can only sleep. But for how long? Srōŭ-drä-ga There, behind the door, over there, in a plywood closet where neither Mother nor I liked to enter. Some mornings are better than others for getting up. Ō-san-nāru O-san means an old man. An old man old. A name for the really old. His real name is Tosashichi. For years he has been racking up the vowels on which he thinks he is fond of bestowing his affection. The one who teaches me is named Arsennan. Puts his hands together, smiling, and bows. If you have eyes, go see what he does with his hands: It is not a gesture of offertory at all, or a ceremonial gathering together and singing of the old song. "It's a good thing your religion of which I give the credit doesn't consist of it," Mother says, although she could probably do it. Arsennan has a very clear and innocent face. But what does Ō-san mean? Who is O-san? Sú-dī-ki-wa. Deserves the worst. It is always Ō-san. Sróŭ-drä-ga When I was born
