Conventional ink jet printers have printing heads including a plurality of nozzles coupled to an array of chambers that are selectively filled with ink. Each chamber includes a nozzle aperture and a vaporization chamber in fluid communication with the nozzle aperture. Selected chambers are also in fluid communication with an ink conduit supplying ink to the chamber. The ink conduit is coupled to a pressurized ink source. An electrical pulse applied to a piezoelectric transducer within the chamber generates a pressure wave that causes ink contained in the chamber to be ejected through the nozzle aperture. To prevent the ink from flooding back into the chamber, a portion of the chamber wall is tapered from the nozzle aperture to the chamber. In prior art printers, the nozzle apertures must be sealed against leakage. In most cases, a gasket is placed on the wall of the nozzle aperture to seal the nozzle aperture against leakage. The gasket may be made of a resilient material such as silicone. Typically the gasket is dispensed between the nozzle aperture and the chamber wall. Often the gasket is cut in the form of a slit or a notch to permit the gasket to be readily disposed in the nozzle aperture. If the gasket is not properly placed in the nozzle aperture, there is a possibility that the gasket will not provide the necessary sealing. For example, if the gasket is disposed in the nozzle aperture and springs inwardly toward the nozzle aperture, the sealing effectiveness of the gasket will be degraded due to the spring force.
