[@B28] have also demonstrated that patients with type I and II VCD may exhibit improved BMFI, with or without surgery. The present study has several limitations. This study was retrospective in nature, and no randomized controlled studies are available in the literature. Furthermore, as mentioned earlier, the criteria to define type I and II VCD are not precisely defined in the literature. There is a concern that the analyses of this study may be affected by the heterogeneity of the definition of type I and II VCD. For example, in patients with type I and II VCD, the criteria for the outcome measurements were not the same among the studies. The most critical problem is that data on the quality of life outcomes are not available. Conclusion {#sec1_5} ===== In patients with VCD, preoperative lower lacrimal and salivary flow were significantly lower in patients with type II VCD than in those with type I VCD, and the amount of flow was significantly related to the size of the stenosis. Improved BMFI at 3 months was demonstrated in patients with type I and II VCD, and a higher BMFI after surgery was significantly associated with a large stenosis and greater improvement in lower eyelid epiphora. Disclosure Statement {#sec1_6} ===== There are no conflicts of interest. !Expression of lacrimal and salivary flow in patients with type I and type II VCD before and after treatment. a A decreased lacrimal flow score (1, 2) and a salivary flow score (1, 2) were found in patients with type II VCD. b An increased lacrimal flow score (1, 2, 3) and a salivary flow 1cdb36666d
