A month after news surfaced of the approval, I tried to find out how the approval was received. It took about a week. I thought this was odd, because it is so common to be able to find information about drug approvals quite easily. In the end, I had two questions: 1) What kind of process did it take to get this drug approved, and 2) What did Wellbutrin belong to? I searched the FDA website, FDA's approval package, docket number, AR-10.000726, and several other sources. I was disappointed to find that no information was available about the approval process or drug classification. Nothing about Wellbutrin indicated that it would have a substance classification. I don't believe the FDA is trying to withhold information about the approval of generic Wellbutrin. I suspect they have been overwhelmed by a very high volume of requests and don't have the staff to respond. That is my guess. What is happening here is that drug companies are filing for generic drugs without classifications. I expect that, as the FDA is backlogged, they will be approved. Many generic drugs that are approved this way, don't have substance classifications until their expiration date. Generic drugs approved this way, can give greater discounts to physician offices (or other health providers) that use them in their practice, and they are useful for health practitioners and their patients who are looking for great deals. In many cases, I would predict that this approval is not going to be a long-lived experience. If the generic drug companies (who are the only ones who can be approved this way) don't advertise it as having a substance classification, then they may not have a substance classification. Some may not be listed as having a substance classification because of a drug that is the "generic" for a specific market segment, or there are other drugs in the same class that may be the generic for that market segment. This may cause problems for physicians who rely on substance classifications to make decisions, or for patients looking for an alternative if the generic drug is not listed as having a substance classification. What is going on here is that drug companies are unwilling to spend money on advertising generic drugs as having substance classifications, to no avail. For years, they have been sending us a message about the importance of an NQF, just so that the FDA approved their product. They have been very good at selling the importance of their product and its effectiveness. Now, they are saying that they just want to be recognized as having generic products without substance classifications. 5ec8ef588b
