This program will scan, review and suggest changes to the way you write documents. Mann's simian virus 5 produces receptor-dependent and receptor-independent infection of the hefA+ mammalian cells. The capacity of the oncogenic SV40 to infect the late 90 percent of the cells of a population of monkey (CV-1) cells has been exploited to analyze the function of the SV40-encoded T antigen (TAg). Saturating doses of recombinant TAg expressed in Escherichia coli produced an irreversible inhibition of the infectivity of the other SV40-infected CV-1 cells. The efficiency of inhibition was TAg- and TAg+ cell-dependent and it could be overcome by a low dose of SV40. These properties indicate that the SV40 TAg is a powerful inhibitor of viral infectivity in a mammalian cell. A cell-free transcription-translation system containing HeLa cell extracts was used to study the receptor-specificity of SV40. TAg was found to inhibit both the cellular binding and infection of the T antigen-negative HeLa cells. TAg did not inhibit the binding of 35S-labeled SV40 and SV40-infected CV-1 cells to the HeLa cell receptors. However, in the presence of TAg, these receptors bound and were infected by a low dose of SV40, indicating that TAg binds to the receptors but does not act as a receptor. In addition, a HeLa cell line was selected for its stable expression of the SV40 T antigen and its high constitutive level of receptor synthesis. The selection was based on the transfection of the HeLa cells with a plasmid carrying a gene encoding SV40 T antigen. This strategy allowed us to directly determine the function of TAg in the expression of viral receptors and the mechanism of receptor-mediated infection of eukaryotic cells. We found that a low concentration of SV40 could productively infect these cells, indicating that TAg does not block receptor-mediated infection.
