They call this the crack amendment, because of the change in federal law. And it appears to be working. During the first year of the crack amendment, the number of career offender cases went from 1,042 to 621, according to the federal data. In each of the first few months of this year, federal prosecutors filed only about 80 percent as many career offender cases as they did during the same time last year, according to Justice Department data. The reasons are unclear, but they appear to include the deterrent effect of the new federal laws, a broader array of defendants who qualify, and a heightened enforcement effort. For years, Illinois courts have given a presumption that prosecutors won't file motions under the crack amendment in plea deals, so that defendants can't go to trial and test the new rules in an adversarial process. Illinois judges have consistently enforced this presumption. But on July 15, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that such a presumption was unconstitutional and that judges must apply the crack amendment on a case-by-case basis, even when the issue has been waived by the parties. On August 3, 2007, the Sentencing Commission voted to adopt the proposed amendment and submitted it to Congress. It was one of many amendments that Congress passed to crack sentencing law in August 2007. The amended crack law took effect on November 1, 2007, three months before the next guidelines amendment took effect. The new law provides a 1 to 1.5 ratio between crack and powder cocaine, and also expands the types of drugs subject to the crack penalty. The law does not apply to persons whose cases fall outside the provision of the Fair Sentencing Act. Therefore, those convicted for their status as a career offender or for a crime involving 100 kilograms or more of a controlled substance (such as Kenney) would not be eligible for re-sentencing.
