That's a bit of the cost of having a lot of flexibility in terms of the process and workflow, so it goes both ways. You can become a perfectionist about some things, and people who are a bit slow to get on board may not be too happy with the workflow and may clash with you. You can also fall into the trap of just doing things in a way that you like without really considering what the results might be. Maybe I'm being biased because I've been using Photoshop for all these years and I use it almost everyday. I honestly think that Photodunes is the way to go and I think that it will be adopted pretty quickly if people start adopting it. I'm not a huge fan of using forums to review files. It's kind of a dog's breakfast of shared work in that you're representing yourself, your company, and your product, and depending on how a client responds to your comment or other people's. Until you use it, you can't possibly even imagine how a tool like this could save you time and improve the work of a design team. Photodunes, for example, allows you to share the development of a project by having users comment on particular pages as they go along. It also helps you easily display the design for testers. You should know that there might be a day when Adobe stops supporting certain features and releases a newer version with those features. So, after a while, all photographers will have to update to the latest version in order to get the features that they want. Be sure to keep this in mind.
